Quality by Design and Process Validation Seminar June 20th, 2014

The FDA has made significant progress in implementing the concepts of "Quality by Design" (QbD) into pre-market processes. The QbD concept is that quality should be built into a product through a deep understanding of the product, both how it's developed Process validation refers to the documented evidence that processes are operated within established parameters and that it can perform effectively to fulfill its intended purpose. With the FDA asking for more scientific arguments to support activities, the "life cycle" approach to process validation was born, as it provides opportunities for process validation across the entire product lifecycle.

and how it's manufactured.

The QbD initiative forms the basis for process validation activities and attempts to provide guidance on pharmaceutical development to facilitate design of products and processes with maximum efficacy, safety profile and product manufacturability.
